"This is one of the healthlest and most interesting tales of fiction that we remember to have read. It is, in truth, the history of a woman's heart narrated as only a woman obald depict it, for every minute phase of that or gan of affections, feelings, and cassions is laid bare, with the skill and delicacy of a finished practitizener. Ella, the heroine, is oracinally a vain self-deceiving woman, who is carried through a course of everys, in which her heart and mind are trained, by trusis and disappointments, to rest on the only true security we can confluently rely on in this life. The progress of the narrative introduces numerous examples of character, and a great diversity of incidents sufficient to keep the reador's attention alive, while the high moral, religious pranciples, naturally evolved from the story, render the work a truly valuable and unerceptionable production. It should form a portion of every lady's inbrary in the country."
